A MANIA FOR BUYING RESULTS IN A STRANGE COLLECTION

Possibly the most remarkable thing that ever came to light in the history of the society of theatrical and social society, is the discovery of a valuable collection of clothing and furniture within the last five days, but in less than a week the larger part of which had been removed to a strange place. The collection was the result of the efforts of Mrs. Theodore Moss, a woman of known social standing, who had been able to secure the cooperation of several prominent ladies in the city. The collection was intended for the benefit of a charity organization, but before the work was completed, the ladies who had been working on the project, had been approached by a mysterious organization, which had offered to buy the entire collection for a sum that was far greater than the value of the items. The ladies were faced with the choice of either selling the collection to the mysterious organization or keeping it for the benefit of the charity organization. In the end, they decided to sell the collection to the mysterious organization for a sum that was far greater than the value of the items. The collection was then removed to a strange place, where it was placed in a safe and protected area. The mystery of the organization and the fate of the collection remains unknown to this day.
