IS COEDUCATION A FAILURE? TUTTS AND PENNINGTON SAY "YES"

A Menace to Any College," Says President Hamilton of the Former--President Read of the Latter Announces a Change

By William A. L. Scranton, Special to The New York Times

Published: May 8, 1910

Copyright © The New York Times

Co-education was a failure! There are, according to the Times, a number of examples in this country and in Europe that have shown the failure of co-education. The article discusses the distinctive opinions of President Hamilton of Tufts College and President Penning顿 of Bates College, both of which institutions have co-education programs. The Times suggests that these institutions have been unable to achieve the desired results and that the failure of co-education may be attributed to various factors such as the difficulty of finding a suitable balance between the needs of men and women, the difficulties of integrating the two groups, and the lack of clear goals for co-education.

The article concludes with a call for a change in the approach to co-education, suggesting that a more focused and intentional approach may be necessary to achieve the desired outcomes. The Times suggests that institutions may need to reassess their goals and strategies to ensure the success of co-education programs.

The Times also highlights the concerns of President Penning顿 of Bates College, who has expressed his belief that co-education is not working and that changes need to be made. President Penning顿 has stated that co-education is a "menace to any college" and has called for a change in the approach to co-education.

Overall, the article presents a critical perspective on co-education, suggesting that it has not been successful and that changes need to be made to ensure the success of these programs.