"NO CENTENARIAN LIVING," SAYS DR. WOODS HUTCHINSON.

Probably Only Three Ever Lived to be Over 100 Years of Age He Concludes After Studying the Question of Centenarians.

And Probably Only Three Ever Lived to be Over 100 Years of Age He Concludes After Studying the Question of Centenarians.

The meaning of Hutchinson's conclusion that the greatest number of those who claim to be centenarians are always found in those communities where immigration is most intense, is that immigration brings new life and new vigor to these communities. Hutchinson believes that the natural life of the human race tends to remain constant, but that immigration brings new blood, new vigor, and new life to the communities where it is most intense. Hutchinson further believes that the centenarian is a rarity, and that the number of centenarians is always found in those communities where immigration is most intense. Hutchinson concludes that the centenarian is a rarity, and that the number of centenarians is always found in those communities where immigration is most intense.

The meaning of Hutchinson's conclusion that the greatest number of those who claim to be centenarians are always found in those communities where immigration is most intense, is that immigration brings new life and new vigor to these communities. Hutchinson believes that the natural life of the human race tends to remain constant, but that immigration brings new blood, new vigor, and new life to the communities where it is most intense. Hutchinson further believes that the centenarian is a rarity, and that the number of centenarians is always found in those communities where immigration is most intense. Hutchinson concludes that the centenarian is a rarity, and that the number of centenarians is always found in those communities where immigration is most intense.

The meaning of Hutchinson's conclusion that the greatest number of those who claim to be centenarians are always found in those communities where immigration is most intense, is that immigration brings new life and new vigor to these communities. Hutchinson believes that the natural life of the human race tends to remain constant, but that immigration brings new blood, new vigor, and new life to the communities where it is most intense. Hutchinson further believes that the centenarian is a rarity, and that the number of centenarians is always found in those communities where immigration is most intense. Hutchinson concludes that the centenarian is a rarity, and that the number of centenarians is always found in those communities where immigration is most intense.

The meaning of Hutchinson's conclusion that the greatest number of those who claim to be centenarians are always found in those communities where immigration is most intense, is that immigration brings new life and new vigor to these communities. Hutchinson believes that the natural life of the human race tends to remain constant, but that immigration brings new blood, new vigor, and new life to the communities where it is most intense. Hutchinson further believes that the centenarian is a rarity, and that the number of centenarians is always found in those communities where immigration is most intense. Hutchinson concludes that the centenarian is a rarity, and that the number of centenarians is always found in those communities where immigration is most intense.