The Miller family always prepared a Christmas gift. The first boys were quite young when their father gave them their first books. One of these was a history of the World, the other a biography of Washington. They were both old. The boys were old because they were old. They had been read over and over again. They were old because they were old. They had been read over and over again. They were old because they were old. They had been read over and over again.

The Millers were very fond of books. They read them all the time. They read them, too, because they were old. They had been read over and over again. They were old because they were old. They had been read over and over again.
