A LITTLE ISLAND NEAR NEW YORK PEOPLED WITH BABIES

Taken from Incoming Steamers Suffering from Measles, Scarlet Fever and Other Ills, They Are Cared for on Hoffman Island Till They Get Well.

O

A little body of "globe," made up of many different parts, the body of man is a vast machine, working in the same manner as any other machine, and when it breaks down, the result is sickness.

Chevy and Haven Island share a very similar characteristic in this respect, the body's ability to heal itself when properly cared for, and the need for medical attention when it is not. Both islands have experienced outbreaks of measles, scarlet fever, and other illnesses, and in both cases, the inhabitants have been cared for on Hoffman Island until they recovered.

The story of Hoffman Island is one of resilience and recovery. Despite the challenges brought by the diseases, the community has come together to provide care and support, ensuring that all those affected have the chance to heal and return to their normal lives. This is a testament to the human spirit, which can overcome even the most daunting obstacles through cooperation and compassion.

Types of Patients

Some of the Nurses.

In the Babies' Ward, Hoffman Island.

The hospital on Hoffman Island was prepared in order to guard against infection, the wounded supplies being kept in separate rooms, and the medical staff was trained to handle the patients correctly. The hospital was equipped with the latest medical equipment, and the nurses were skilled in caring for the sick.

The patients were taken care of by nurses who worked tirelessly to ensure that they received the best possible care. The hospital was clean and well-ventilated, providing a conducive environment for healing.

The patients were given nutritious meals that were specially prepared to suit their needs. The doctors and nurses were constantly monitoring their progress, making adjustments to their care as necessary.

With the patients recovering, the community on Hoffman Island was able to resume its normal activities. The children returned to school, and the farmers resumed their work in the fields.
