It is, and a Government Official Marshals Some Impressive Facts to Prove That It Is Not the Less a Labor Question Because There Is No Housekeepers' Union.

The problem of household service is one of the most important that the working world has to face. It is a problem of immense material consequence, affecting the lives of millions, and it is also a problem of moral and social consequence, involving the welfare of the whole community. The protection of the household worker is a matter of public interest and concern, and the Government has a duty to take action to protect her rights.

The labor movement has long recognized the importance of household service as a field for organization and collective bargaining. However, the lack of a dedicated union for housekeepers has created many problems for them. The lack of a union has led to exploitation and injustices for household workers. The Government official, who marshals the impressive facts, argues that household service is not less a labor question because there is no housekeepers' union.

The official presents several key facts to support his case. First, the demand for household service is very high, with millions of households relying on it. Second, the working conditions of household workers are often harsh, with long hours and low pay. Third, there is a lack of legal protection for household workers, making it difficult for them to enforce their rights. Fourth, the lack of a union means that there is no effective voice for the interests of household workers.

The official concludes by urging the Government to take action to protect household workers. He argues that the labor movement must continue to organize and represent the interests of household workers, and that the Government has a duty to ensure that their rights are protected.

---

The image shows a diagram titled "The Breakfast Table of the Future." It illustrates a vision of how the household service industry might evolve. The diagram includes artwork of a futuristic kitchen with furniture and appliances designed for efficiency and convenience. The text accompanying the image discusses the potential benefits of such a system, such as increased productivity and reduced labor costs. The article suggests that the Government's role is crucial in facilitating this transition, ensuring that the benefits are distributed fairly and that workers' rights are protected.