Edwin A. Brown of Denver Tells of His Experiences as a Tramp and Suggests Radical Measures for Helping Homeless Human Beings.

The story of Edwin A. Brown of Denver is one of the most interesting and inspiring of the tramp's experiences. He tells how he was a successful businessman and how he was forced to the streets by a series of misfortunes. Brown has been a tramp for over ten years and has traveled extensively throughout the United States. He has had the opportunity to observe the condition of the homeless and has come to the conclusion that something must be done to help them.

Brown believes that the problem of the homeless can be solved by establishing a system of public works and employment. He suggests that the government should create a series of public works projects that would provide employment for the homeless. These projects would be financed by a combination of government and private funds.

Brown also believes that the government should provide housing for the homeless. He suggests that the government should establish a system of public housing that would provide safe and affordable housing for the homeless. This system would be financed by a combination of government and private funds.

In addition to these measures, Brown believes that the government should provide medical care and education for the homeless. He suggests that the government should establish a system of medical care and education that would be available to all homeless individuals.

In conclusion, Brown believes that the problem of the homeless can be solved by establishing a system of public works and employment, public housing, medical care, and education. He believes that these measures would go a long way toward helping the homeless and improving their quality of life.