The young man was a Tribune reporter. He covered the story of the first subway, which opened in 1904. The tunnel was long and narrow, and the tracks were laid on a slight grade. The young man reported on the progress of the construction, and described it as a 'daring feat of engineering.'

The young man’s reporting was so detailed that it inspired the construction company to build a display of the tunnel in their offices. The display was a replica of the tunnel, complete with tracks and a miniature train. The young man was impressed by the display, and decided to write a book about the history of the subway. He interviewed the workers, and wrote about the challenges they faced.
