MORE HORSE THIEVERY IN NEW YORK THAN THE FAR WEST

So Easy to Do and Hard to Detect That Detectives Are Puzzled What to Do—Looks Like an Organized Industry.

GIOVANNI ZIETO,
LOUIS FEIDMAN

MAY 1, 1911

Horse thieves have been at it with considerable success for a good many months, and there is no sign that they are about to slacken their efforts. In fact, the situation is regarded as being worse than ever, and the police are at a loss as to how to cope with the problem.

Published: April 23, 1911
Copyright © The New York Times

detective train, which was easily assigned to a case by which it was figured, put up a good fight. The man was heard to say that the police and detectives are trying to make it look like a struggle. He was assisted by Bob L. Feidman and others, and they formed a regular system for disarranging the horses and making the appearance of a struggle.

They found that most of the horses stolen by the police were found in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, but that the losses in New York were the greatest.

The police have been unable to trace the horses, but they believe that the men who stole them are working in New York, and that they are likely to continue their operations. The police are now looking for more horses, and they believe that they will be able to locate them soon.

The police are now looking for more horses, and they believe that they will be able to locate them soon.