Nine of them in overalls learning how to become farmers and landscape gardeners on her estate at Hempstead, and they are only the advance guard.

When first sent to us, they were about 15 years old. The oldest girl is now 19, and the youngest 16. The rest are 18, 17, 18, 17, 18, and 17, respectively. They were all selected from a large number of applicants who came to the school, and they are all very intelligent girls.

The school is located about 15 miles from New York City, and it is open to boys as well as girls. The girls are housed in a large dormitory, and they have their meals in the school kitchen. They are taught by a trained teacher, who is also their housemother.

The girls are taught all the skills necessary for farming, including the care of animals, the cultivation of crops, and the maintenance of the garden. They also learn the importance of conservation and the need to educate others about the importance of protecting the environment.

The girls are paid a small wage for their work, and they are encouraged to save money for their future. The school is supported by the New York Times, and it is open to girls from all over the United States. The girls are expected to work hard and to be responsible for their own success.

The school is run by a group of dedicated volunteers, who work tirelessly to ensure the success of the girls. They are committed to educating young girls about the importance of taking care of the land and the environment, and they are determined to help the girls achieve their goals.

The school is located in a beautiful rural setting, and it offers a unique opportunity for young girls to learn about the importance of farming and landscaping. It is a wonderful place for girls to grow and develop, and it is a testament to the dedication of its staff and volunteers.
