The world has become insane! One of the most noted insanity experts, Dr. Albert W. Ferris, says that the tension of modern living and the growing use of alcohol are causing an increase in insanity. His report to the State Commission in Lunacy in the United States is causing widespread concern.

Ferris believes that the combination of stress and alcohol is increasing the number of mental health issues. "Insanity is one of the chief contributing factors in stress and strain," he states. "And the stress of modern living, the lack of leisure time, and the increased use of alcohol are all contributing to the problem." Ferris goes on to say that the number of insanity cases has tripled in the last decade, and he attributes this to the constant stress and the growing use of alcohol.

Ferris also points to the increasing number of work-related stressors and the lack of social support as contributing factors. "The high tension of modern living is partly responsible for the increase in insanity," he states. "People are under constant pressure to succeed and achieve, and this can lead to mental health issues." Ferris believes that the lack of support from family and friends can also contribute to the problem of mental health.

Ferris’s report has caused a great deal of concern and debate. Some argue that the problem is a result of modern living, while others blame the growing use of alcohol. Regardless of the cause, Ferris’s report highlights the importance of addressing mental health in the United States. The government and the medical community are now working together to develop solutions to address the growing problem of insanity.

"It is a serious problem that needs to be addressed," Ferris states. "We need to find ways to reduce stress and increase social support to help prevent mental health issues." Ferris’s report has prompted a great deal of discussion and action, and the future of mental health in the United States remains uncertain.
