Mayor Gaynor's Statement to That Effect Starts a Discussion—A Distinct American College Type Being Developed, Unlike the European University Man

When Mayor Gaynor in his recent address to the students of the city said that he believed the American college was not a "barroom" and the American college man was not a "boiler," he merely put in words a sentiment that is now current generally and widely. Yet the American student is distinctly different from the European in many ways, and the American college is a very different type of institution.

The American student, unlike his European counterpart, is not primarily a scholar, but rather a practical man of business. He is more interested in the practical applications of his education than in the abstract theories. This is due in part to the fact that the American college is a very different type of institution from the European university.

In Europe, the university is the place where the scholar can pursue his studies in peace and quiet, free from the distractions of the world. In America, the college is a place where the student must work hard to make a living. This is due to the fact that the college is a private institution, and the students must pay for their education.

The American student is not only different in his mode of life, but also in his mode of thought. He is more practical and less theoretical than the European student. This is due in part to the fact that the American college is a place where the student must learn to think independently.

The American student is also different in his mode of dress. He is more likely to wear casual clothes than the European student. This is due in part to the fact that the American college is a place where the student is free to express his individuality.

The American student is also different in his mode of communication. He is more likely to use the telephone than the European student. This is due in part to the fact that the American college is a place where the student is free to express his individuality.

The American student is also different in his mode of transportation. He is more likely to use the automobile than the European student. This is due in part to the fact that the American college is a place where the student is free to express his individuality.
