The Wonderful Art, Long Used in China, Rapidly Being Adopted by the Police of This Country, with the New York Force Leading.

The Chinese have a remarkable form of inscriptions known as "fingerprints." A criminal who leaves his fingerprints behind him is never the worse for it, provided they are not discovered. The Chinese have used this art for ages, and it is now being adopted by the police of this country.

The process of taking fingerprints is simple. A criminal is required to place his hand on a sheet of paper and press it firmly. The paper is then folded and sent to the police station, where it is examined by a fingerprint expert. If the fingerprints are clear and distinct, they are classified and recorded. If they are not clear, the criminal is required to place his hand on another sheet of paper and press it firmly until the fingerprints are clear.

The Chinese have used this art for ages, and it is now being adopted by the police of this country.

The process of taking fingerprints is simple. A criminal is required to place his hand on a sheet of paper and press it firmly. The paper is then folded and sent to the police station, where it is examined by a fingerprint expert. If the fingerprints are clear and distinct, they are classified and recorded. If they are not clear, the criminal is required to place his hand on another sheet of paper and press it firmly until the fingerprints are clear.

The Chinese have used this art for ages, and it is now being adopted by the police of this country.

The process of taking fingerprints is simple. A criminal is required to place his hand on a sheet of paper and press it firmly. The paper is then folded and sent to the police station, where it is examined by a fingerprint expert. If the fingerprints are clear and distinct, they are classified and recorded. If they are not clear, the criminal is required to place his hand on another sheet of paper and press it firmly until the fingerprints are clear.

The Chinese have used this art for ages, and it is now being adopted by the police of this country.

The process of taking fingerprints is simple. A criminal is required to place his hand on a sheet of paper and press it firmly. The paper is then folded and sent to the police station, where it is examined by a fingerprint expert. If the fingerprints are clear and distinct, they are classified and recorded. If they are not clear, the criminal is required to place his hand on another sheet of paper and press it firmly until the fingerprints are clear.

The Chinese have used this art for ages, and it is now being adopted by the police of this country.