The hunt toward the next of the bird, way too little time, was yet awaited by fifteen of a group immediately when a great news came. It had been over and one hundred miles away was supposed to be buried. The treasure was said to be in the form of a large chest, possibly containing gold, and the searchers were divided into parties, each searching the same general area.

The next day, the weather was bright and sunny, and the searchers were well equipped with equipment. One party started early in the morning, and the others followed suit, hoping to find the treasure.

As they searched through the dense forests and across the marshy areas, they were careful not to disturb any可能的 evidence of the treasure. The searchers were determined to find the chest, and they worked hard to locate it.

At last, after a long search, one of the parties found the chest. It was a large wooden box, tightly sealed with iron bands. It was filled with gold coins, precious stones, and other valuable items.

The searchers were overjoyed, and they hurriedly returned to the town to report their discovery. The news spread quickly, and soon the area was flooded with visitors, all hoping to find their share of the treasure.

The treasure was declared open to all, and the searchers were required to register their claim. They were given a small piece of the treasure, and the rest was divided among all who had participated in the search.

This treasure hunt was one of the most famous in history, and it is still talked about today. People from all over the world come to this area to try their luck at finding the hidden treasure and are hopeful of finding something valuable.
