NEW FACTS ON THE INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

More than a score of the large bakeries of London were visited, and the bread was carefully examined. The average cost of bread in London is 4 cents a pound. In New York and other American cities the same grade of bread costs 5 cents a pound. The penny may seem trifling, but it means an increase of 25 per cent. in the cost of the food staple.

In the working districts of London a four-pound loaf is sold for 12 cents, which, when compared to the second day's stale bread which wholesale bakers in New York and other American cities sell, is 25 cents.

The argument that the high price of meat is due to the building up of the West is also advanced in the case of the cost of raising wheat. It is said, however, that steadily increased, because the land is higher, and the cost of labor has gone up and continues to rise. The manufacturers again deny that they make any undue profit.

In this article we have seen the staple food in the cost of life, there may be found food for thought.

More than a score of the large bakeries of London were visited, and the bread was carefully examined. The average cost of bread in London is 4 cents a pound. In New York and other American cities the same grade of bread costs 5 cents a pound. The penny may seem trifling, but it means an increase of 25 per cent. in the cost of the food staple.

In the working districts of London a four-pound loaf is sold for 12 cents, which, when compared to the second day's stale bread which wholesale bakers in New York and other American cities sell, is 25 cents.

The argument that the high price of meat is due to the building up of the West is also advanced in the case of the cost of raising wheat. It is said, however, that steadily increased, because the land is higher, and the cost of labor has gone up and continues to rise. The manufacturers again deny that they make any undue profit.

In this article we have seen the staple food in the cost of life, there may be found food for thought.

More than a score of the large bakeries of London were visited, and the bread was carefully examined. The average cost of bread in London is 4 cents a pound. In New York and other American cities the same grade of bread costs 5 cents a pound. The penny may seem trifling, but it means an increase of 25 per cent. in the cost of the food staple.

In the working districts of London a four-pound loaf is sold for 12 cents, which, when compared to the second day's stale bread which wholesale bakers in New York and other American cities sell, is 25 cents.

The argument that the high price of meat is due to the building up of the West is also advanced in the case of the cost of raising wheat. It is said, however, that steadily increased, because the land is higher, and the cost of labor has gone up and continues to rise. The manufacturers again deny that they make any undue profit.

In this article we have seen the staple food in the cost of life, there may be found food for thought.

More than a score of the large bakeries of London were visited, and the bread was carefully examined. The average cost of bread in London is 4 cents a pound. In New York and other American cities the same grade of bread costs 5 cents a pound. The penny may seem trifling, but it means an increase of 25 per cent. in the cost of the food staple.

In the working districts of London a four-pound loaf is sold for 12 cents, which, when compared to the second day's stale bread which wholesale bakers in New York and other American cities sell, is 25 cents.

The argument that the high price of meat is due to the building up of the West is also advanced in the case of the cost of raising wheat. It is said, however, that steadily increased, because the land is higher, and the cost of labor has gone up and continues to rise. The manufacturers again deny that they make any undue profit.

In this article we have seen the staple food in the cost of life, there may be found food for thought.